

Enjoy the life without plans

I prefer not to make any plans for my free time. The reason that is –without planning activities for my leisure time, I can enjoy the slow pace of time, do the thing I've just thought.

Plans can never catch changes. No matter how well your plan is, it will still have some trifling things that affect your mood for leisure time. For example, you plan to go bird-seeing on this weekend. You surfed the internet three days before, searching information for finding an excellent place. You ask your friend for lending you the telescope, he said yes definitely. And you even have decided what to wear, what to bring that day, starting to imagine how wonderful the weekend will. All the things have set, just wait for the weekend comes.

But things are never going so smoothly, the weather forecast says that the place you're planning to go will have a big rain; your friend call you that he can't lend you the telescope because his daughter need that for going to the concert; your boss give you an emergency call, says that you have to hand on a project on Monday. Obviously, your perfect plan for weekend is almost ruined. All you can do is wearing the raincoat, see the ordinary swallows flying through and worry about the project you need to finish.

So, not to planning any activities seems to be a better choice. I have many experience about having a good free time without any plans. Once, I just slept over the morning, so I took a walk, I heard the bird chirping, saw the kids playing happily, and I climbed on an old big tree, feeling the wind blew through my face, enjoying the beautiful scene from the tree. How wonderful it was! To my surprise, an adorable squirrel suddenly showed up, and he even jumped through my leg, giving a good chance for watching it. That was really a best leisure time I've had.

I strongly recommend everyone to have one time, not planning anything for your free time, and you'll find another wonders this way.
